1/ James approached the doorway with caution. The house loomed before him, a crumbling and forbidding giant. Had he not been desperate to shelter from the storm, he would never in a million years have dared to go anywhere near the house, let alone be about to attempt to venture inside. As he looked up and saw the black ravens glaring at him from the roof, he felt a shiver go down his spine. Suddenly, without warning, the door flew open to reveal the vast, gloomy hallway. James took a deep breath.....

2/ The castle stood alone high up on the remote, deserted mountain top. Alone that is apart from some tall trees that managed to obscure parts of the dark, shadowy grey building. Clouds wrapped themselves around the moon managing to blot out parts of the old, granite building. Peering up from the safety of the gravel path, the castle looked as if it was staring directly down at me, somehow pulling me towards it like some kind of magnet. What was I doing here? Was I mad? What had come over me?

I could just about make out the path ahead. My small torch was struggling to shine through the gloomy evening air.
